However, Planet Miata shipped me the replacement engine on this nifty pallet stand, and I thought I'd show a couple of pictures of it. It's just a pallet, a couple of pieces of 2x4, some plywood, and 2 bolts, but it supports the engine by two bolt holes and the block, rather than letting the oil pan get damaged.

When you push your Miata to the limits it heats up the engine faster, and you don't want to over burn it. Allowing a steady flow of cold air into the system will set the engine free to reach its full potential and wake those sleeping horses that you never knew were there. There is a science behind this, actually.
